STAT

This will acknowledge your recent letter.

We find it difficult to be responsive to requests for advice on how to prepare for a career in intelligence work. This work embraces numerous and widely divergent vocational fields; the common ingredients of their application in our work are the methodology and disciplines of the intelligence process. We are usually interested in young people who have demonstrated academic achievement in international relations, political science, economics, the applied sciences, and foreign languages. In addition, there are frequently openings for junior intelligence analysts or junior editors who have studied English and journalism.

We believe that we should not advise a young person in his selection of a field of academic specialization without some knowledge of his intellectual capacity and his aptitudes and insight into his motivation and career objectives. If we nevertheless suggested courses of study which a young person should take in order to enter our service, there is an implied commitment to offer him employment if he should follow such advice. The changing nature of our personnel requirements, however, and the suitability factors pertinent to the final selection of our employees make it impossible for us to give such assurance. Accordingly, we have suggested to you a broad range of subjects within which you may select those of greatest personal interest. In so doing you may keep in mind the requirements for preparing yourself for other fields of employment as well.

Your interest in our service is appreciated and we hope that the information we have supplied will be helpful to you. If your interest in our service continues, we shall be glad to receive an application from you several months prior to the completion to your college work.

Sincerely,

RE: Your letter of 11 May 1972

STAT

I wish to thank you and the Agency for considering my application even though my qualifications were not sufficient. Since my police and electronics experience were not sufficient to qualify for a position with your organization I would like to request your assistance.

Since my desire to join the agency is still strong I would hope that you could give me some information on what fields of technology are now needed that I may pursue study in those fields in the hope of one day becoming qualified for employment.

Your assistance in this matter will be greatly appreciated.

Sincerely yours

Remarks:

Reviewed again--Police and Electronic background--no Agency requirements at present for his background in these fields. Police background is rarely wanted in this type of Agency.

According to resume, not enough college specialization to meet current requirements. If he gets B.S. in business, possibilities exist such as accountant in Office of Finance.
